Eukaryotic cells can be classified according to their morphology and function. One such classification is based on their endocytosis; in order for a cell to endocytose something, the external aspect of the cell membrane must fuse with a vacuole or vesicle. This can be triggered by various signals, such as temperature changes, mechanical stimulation, chemical stimuli, or ionic changes in the extracellular medium. Endocytosis can also be initiated by molecular binding of specific ligands to cell surface receptors. The lipophilic tracers 1,1'-dioctadecyl-3,3',3'-tetramethylindocarbocyanine perchlorate (DiI) or 1-(2-[6-((7-nitro-2-1,3-benzoxadiazol-4-yl)amino)hexyl]carbamoyl)hexadecanoyl)-[14C]triphenylphosphonium chloride (NBD-TPA), and the fluorochrome acridine orange are examples of dyes which have been used as lipophilic tracers. Such tracers are taken up by cells through various types of endocytosis, including phagocytosis. Lipophilic dyes are taken up through pinocytosis, and visualize cellular compartments and organelles, especially lysosomes, in the cytoplasm. The labelled organelles are described as having the same appearance as the unlabelled organelles. Some of the dyes are membrane-permeable, and are internalized by cells through invagination and scission of the plasma membrane. Others may be internalized by a receptor-mediated process.
